- LEADING CITIES INVEST provides inflation protection, since rents are indexed in most cases.

- Key risks

- Property risks such as negative changes in the budgeted rental income for properties, declines in value due to negative trends in individual properties or the real estate market as a whole, and changes in the property management costs can impact the investment fund's performance and as a result can also adversely affect the unit value.
- The most important counterparty credit risk for an open-ended real estate fund is tenant default risk. This describes the loss of or reduction in rental income due to changes in tenants' ability to pay.
- Other market risks, such as interest rate-related risks affecting the liquidity portfolio and debt financing, changes in the price or value of the cash funds invested in financial instruments, and declines in value due to exchange rate changes for assets that are not denominated in the fund currency can also lead to fluctuations in the unit value.
- The main liquidity risks are that the cash funds invested will not be sufficient to service redemption requests and to guarantee orderly ongoing management, or that they will not be available when needed. Despite the implementation of measures to generate liquidity, events affecting cash flows may result in the suspension of unit redemption.
- In addition, operational risks due to the fund's business processes or external factors can impact the value of the fund assets.
- Sustainability risks in the form of negative changes in environmental, social, or governance factors could occur as additional risk factors for the above-mentioned risk types, and could lead to financial losses or reputational damage. As climate change gathers pace, physical and transitional climate risks in particular are becoming relevant as subsets of sustainability risks.
